Taylor Arluck is an associate in the Labor & Employment Law Department and a member of the Labor-Management Relations Group. Taylor represents unionized and non-unionized employers in all stages of labor-management relations and in proceedings before the National Labor Relations Board. Taylor's practice focuses on representing employers in matters regarding unfair labor practices, union elections, collective bargaining agreements, work-stoppages, work-jurisdictional disputes, secondary boycotts, hot-cargo agreements, and labor arbitrations. Taylor has also provided labor and employment-law advice in corporate transactions and assisted in highly sensitive workplace investigations and trial preparation.

Taylor's labor-management relations experience spans a variety of industries, including healthcare, entertainment, and media. Taylor's work involves bargaining units of all sizes represented by labor organizations, such as SEIU, Teamsters, and CWA.

While in law school, Taylor interned for Region 29 of the National Labor Relations Board and published his law review note on federal labor law.

Before law school, Taylor worked for more than half a decade as a legal journalist at a subscription-based, legal news service based in New York City, where he covered labor and employment law. During that time, Taylor also attended night classes on labor relations.

As an undergraduate, Taylor worked as an intern for a major American metropolitan daily newspaper based in New York City.
